

Interlachen.

From back, & front of our Hotel sounds most unsabbatic greet our ears on this Sunday morning of July 5th. - The dull heavy roll of the wooden ball as it struck down the skittles, & the voices of Swiss idlers was the animation before our windows, & on the Lake a packet was getting up its steam for a trip to the Fiesbach. The Sabbath at Interlachen, like other places on the continent seems to be kept as a weekly holiday, engrossing the activity of all pleasure seekers. At eleven o'clock, the majority of the Club, indeed all who were not overcome by a state of "suny somnolence," went to church. The sermon was pretty good, altho the doctrines were slightly too much in harmony with human nature to arouse the hearers to severe self-scrutiny. It was rather religion presented walking in ~~black~~ ~~black~~ slippers. The clergyman's nice little rings in our ears, as he spoke of the blessings of a "little grace" - "a spark of fire is fire still" &c. He came, at length to be known by us as "The Revⁿ Little grace". The English services have a charm of their own, that no traveller who is wise will omit to realize. How refreshing it is after wandering for days amongst foreigners, to meet again with fellow countrymen, & join them in prayer for dear old England, in the familiar language of home. In the after part of the day we crossed the covered bridge, & strolled towards the ruined tower of Ringenbergs castle. Mounting its green sward, a group of children surrounded us, & sang one or two pretty hymns. After tea, we turned on the banks of the Aar, when we were all charmed with the beauty of the setting sun, as it shed its blushing rays into on the blanched cheek of the lofty Jungfrau. In the old town of Interlaken, we visited the grave yard of the Lutheran church, where the graves are to be seen labelled after the manners of shrubs in an English garden; a black wooden peg, bearing the names of the sleepers.

Passing the walnut grove, & the church, some one mentioned the cloisters which awakened a desire too engrossing to be resisted; we must walk thro them at this shadowy hour, & visit the sleeping cell of the Poet's hero, at Interlachen. So we passed under the old archway, & groped like Paul Fleming in the Gothic corridor, & wound up the steps of the round tower.

Reaching the first stage, we turned into a large, wooden, triangular balcony, overlooking, on one side a garden & the buttressed apse of the church. Here we stayed awhile, looking at those lancet windows, and limestone mouldings, & perhaps might have revered longer, had not a servant girl with a candle in hand opened the door, exactly as in the experience of Paul Flemming, — query (was it the same servant maid?) and was she looking for the landlord, with the "great eyes, & green coat," to bring her another lodger for the wainscotted chamber that looked South, towards the Valley of Lauterbrunnen?"

No; — we were rather too numerous a party for her latticed room, & from our untimely visitation rather inspired her with awe than joy. — So we left the fine-stained balcony, to finish by a moment in the "Extinguisher." But the tramp of fourteen feet aroused not the owls, but surely the Bailiff, who abode in that elevated story, — he opened his door, candle in hand wherewith he sought to inspect us & enquire our business. But he was not a man with romance in his soul, possibly poor mortal, he had not read Hyperion & so could not intuitively comprehend why seven members of the Junior United Alpine Club should wish to wind round the tower, at that roasting time of night. He thought we sought our hotel; but not ours, it was Mr. W. Longfellow's that we desired to inspect. — So we left the Bailiff — a figure not to be forgotten, as the square little man, in white waistcoat & drab hat stood shading the candle with his hand.— We beat a hasty retreat, laughing at the predicament of servant girl, — the Bailiff, and ourselves.

THE JUNGFRAU

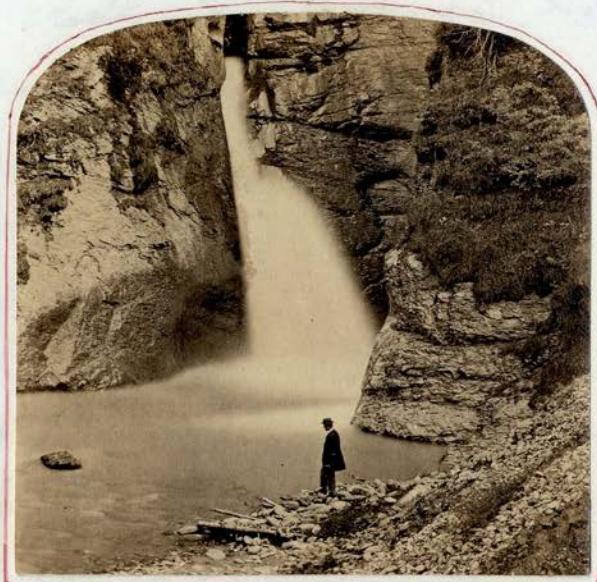

SABBATH MORN AT INTERLACHEN

"Oh! loveliest vision of this lovely land!
Oh! fairest mountain of this mountain land!
So vivid is thy presence, the closed eye Beholds thee still, and yet thou seem'st to fly The earnest gaze of open eye, that fears, Some fairy-like illusion here appears.
Patches of cultivated green, hedged round With trees, while nearer road whose only sound Is foreign tongue of peasant Swiss, - such scene The plain that lies 'twixt thee, & me, between.
Round, & about thee hangs a veil of blue, Tho' scarcely-blue in truth, is the soft hue.

That does not hide, but only serves to show With more delicious charm,- a fuller glow, The varying undulations of thy shape,
The sombre robes of pine that closely drape Relieved with spots of sparkling herbage green, While all adown the sides, where floods have been In winter past, making deep scars, and seams, Each now a mark of beauty on us gleams.
And seems but as the dimpled lines we prize When ver a maiden's face the happy smile doth rise Thine ample skirts in many a graceful fold Descend to earth, whilst round white clouds ^{bold} Repose upon thy breast, and there have lain An hour, or more, and look as if again They did not care to move, and claimed the rest All things enjoy this Sabbath morn so blest.- The lazy movement of a cloud betrays At intervals thy bosom smooth where graze In careless indolence, the happy goat;
About thy head, the white clouds also float,
And there keep guard, as were some holy seat Of God, but clear against the bright azure, We see the sides, - the sloping point, all pure Are cut in rugged rocks, where chamois leaps,- There, gainst the sky, a level line it keeps, Looking for angels' walk, a fitting place,- Another side, the clustering trees embrace, And form a fringe from cloudland seen to base.

Le Trümmelbach near Lauterbrunnen.

In the Hotel du Lac, at the early hours of four in the morning, there was a bustle amongst the voyageurs. At 4.30 the daily demolition of bread buns, & honey took place. Once more, we trust our baggage to the care of the Post Office, to be forwarded to Fribourg, and at 5.30, we rolled off in our cabriolets, leaving Interlachen with Longfellow's farewell thoughts rising to our hearts, - "The sun of life will set ever we forget thee."

A kindly word for "Hotel du Lac". Phasen at random from the list in Baedeker's guide book, we rejected the famous 'Jungfrau', as also the 'Belvedere', - and we had no reason to regret our decision.

On this day we were to cross the Grengen Alp,
- our route lay through the valley of Lauterbrunnen, which was again all loveliness; its verdure laden with a heavy dew, was studded over with transparent crystals, that in the sunlight were diamond prisms, & in the shade a carpet of pearls. - The frowning castle of Lindau-ren had a glance of good humour, to cast this morning over its flowery meadows. It brought to other minds other mornings & other loungers on its green turf, - even the time when Mary Astburton sat & sketched its ruins, whilst Paul Glenning, sitting at her feet, spun that dreamy legend of the poor student Hieronymus, and of his love for the fair Hermione.

We were glad of another ride through the fountain-peopled, and cliff-shadowed Valley, to receive a still deeper impression of the grace of the one and the majesty of the other.

At Lauterbrunnen, we dismissed our carriage henceforward, to depend solely on our feet & alpenstocks, for locomotion.

Armed with our satchels, we started, and set at nought the exorbitant demands of a swarm of guides, that beset us, who, seeing our independence, came down in their terms. One pursued us who became guide, & porter, in one, ingeniously packing all our belongings into a sort of wooden chair, which was fastened on his shoulders.

He made a salaam to the Staubbach, then crossing the river, we came to the usual village of zigzags, from the top of which says a writer, "The Valley of Lauterbrunnen presents the aspect of a mere trench, - the Staubbach is reduced to a thin thread, & its upper fall, & previous windings, before it makes its final leap are exposed to view, & looked down upon."

In the sward was stationed a man & some boys with a horn. It is a wooden tube from five to six feet long, bound round with split withs of willow. This he rested on wedged-shaped hollow troughs & blew as we approached. He must have practised long to emit such a flow of mellow, sonorous sounds, from so unmusical-looking an instrument. The notes died away in softest cadence, which notes were taken up by the mountains & reverberated by them again & again. We had scarcely a moments interval to remark on their sweetness, - when the rocks echoed the same notes in fainter strains, - another pause, & we heard their vibrations still lingering among the clefts, like they expired in but a musical sigh. - The last steps of the mountain gained, we halted to enjoy our extensive view. To the left we had the Jungfrau & her satellites, sheathed in snow, to the right, Lauteracher, laying in the sun, - Musprunn Castle, and Ground, - the lakes of Thun, & Brienz, the isthmus that divides them looking like a mere ribbon of land. More distant still rose the Eiger, & many others, whose names were unknown to us. Half an hour's walk brought us to the "Hôtel de la Jungfrau", - close upon the summit of the Neugern Alp, opposite which rose in almost military line, - the pointed higher, the couled. Nôuch, the glistening Jungfrau, the Silberhorn, the Schreckhorn, - prettily called "The Empress of the Valley": - Longfellow calls them "The Apostles of nature, whose sermons are avalanches". We were hardly seated beneath the awning, in a shaded angle of the sun when the alarm was given, & from a buttress of the Jungfrau toppled a ledge of snow, sweeping with it in its descent other beds of loose snow, till reaching an accustomed groove, it swept like a cascade, & struck in fury on the stony rampart below. Across the high pastures, we walked among herds of four, to give thousand head of cattle, - well favoured fine they were, & ornamented like those of the Palais, - with collar & bells. -

Reaching the Col of the Alps 6690 feet above the sea, our view was very grand, including the Wetterhorn, & lesser Lamberhorn, in addition to those already named. Ruskin who compares the Swiss Alps to a "group of children standing on a table", speaks of the most majestic scenes being produced by some of the peaks, where they "apparently walk to the edge to look over, & thus shew themselves suddenly above the valley in its full height". Such is the case with the Wetterhorn, & higher at Grindelwald.
Immediately before us lay a very valley of desolation, the broken branches, & blanched stems of the trees, standing as mocking remnants of their former growth. Byron & others have attributed ^{the destruction} to avalanches, but the distance of the mountains made that supposition appear incredible. - Looking adown the long, gradual slope to Grindelwald, we were deceived as in
